On the other side, Kashiwa Reysol head coach Ibuki Toda said he was generally satisfied with his team's fifth-place finish, describing their participation as positive despite higher expectations. He explained that the tournament was crucial for assessing player development, particularly as his squad continues to grow physically and mentally. # Exclusive Interview

IBUKI TODA | HEAD COACH OF KASHIWA RESYOL

You once played in this tournament yourself, how special is it to return now?

As a player, my focus was mainly on my own performance and on becoming a better footballer. Returning now as a head coach is very different. Winning is still important, but it is no longer the only priority. My role today is to adapt to my players, understand them, and help them improve individually and collectively. I played in this tournament in 2018 and 2019, and coming back now as a coach gives me a deeper appreciation of its value for young players.

What feelings did this tournament bring back for you?

I focus a lot on respecting each player. I don't treat them as fully professional players, but I also don't treat them like children. I believe young players understand more than we sometimes think, and I never underestimate them. Respect and trust are essential for their development.

Why is this tournament important for young players?

This tournament allows young players to face different footballing styles and very strong academies. It helps coaches assess players under pressure and gives the players a clear understanding of the level required internationally. The experience itself is extremely valuable for their growth.

What qualities from your playing days do you most want your players to carry forward?

There isn't one single skill that keeps you in football. The most important things are believing in yourself, creating your own opportunities, staying positive, and trusting your abilities. Commitment is key, if players truly believe in their potential and work for it, they can build a strong career.

What advice would you give to your team?

There must be more willing to take away opportunities and use them for our own benefit and perform better when it comes to chances of scoring a goal. These opportunities are rare, and they can't be lost.
